

STARS JOIN PETA TO SHED SKINS

Spanish beauty Penélope Cruz is as admired for her style as she is for her film roles – she consistently makes fashion magazines’ “best-dressed” lists. But there’s one thing this stylish star will never wear on (or off) the red carpet: fur. Penélope, the latest celebrity to pose for a PETA anti-fur ad, is a fitting emblem of the modern, glamorous woman who knows that there’s nothing more beautiful than a woman who has a look that kills without anyone having to die for it.

PETA pal Olivia Munn turned heads in Hollywood when she unveiled her racy anti-fur ad. Olivia also narrated PETA’s exposé of the Chinese fur industry and urged consumers to leave fur off their shopping lists. Investigations of fur farms and markets in China have revealed that raccoon dogs are beaten with steel pipes and left to die slowly and that, after a life of almost unimaginably misery, rabbits’ necks are broken while the animals are still conscious and able to feel pain.

Vancouver native and actor Emmanuelle Vaugier visited PETA’s Los Angeles office to narrate an exposé on Canada’s annual seal slaughter – and Entertainment Tonight Canada camera crews were there to document it all. In the video, Emmanuelle says that while the beating and skinning of baby seals “is obviously cruel,” it’s also a waste of taxpayer dollars. “Millions are spent propping up this dying industry.”

Stars Join PETA to Shed Skins

2012

Vancouver native and actor Emmanuelle Vaugier visited PETA's Los Angeles office to narrate an expose on Canada's annual seal slaughter -- and Entertainment Tonight Canada camera crews were there to document it all. In the video, Emmanuelle says that while the beating and skinning of baby seals "is obviously cruel," it's also a waste of taxpayer dollars. "Millions are spent propping up this dying industry."